The digitalisation mandate in alternative credit

Sumit Gupta of Oxane Partners reflects on the evolution of alternative credit, the strategic and operational goals for investment managers, and how they are preparing for the post-Covid-19 world.

"We have seen first-hand how technology enables first-movers to accelerate ahead."

diversification to new asset classes and strategies. In the post-Covid-19 world where resilience and continuity are of the utmost importance, investment managers should also evaluate support services and outsourcing to help them achieve these objectives. While the initial focus for most digital transformation projects starts with productivity and efficiency gains that help in cost optimisation, the long-term benefits are often a strategic transformation that helps investment managers in optimising resources, building agility

The Game Changers: Technology Providers in Private Credit

Kanav Kalia, chief sales and marketing officer at Oxane Partners, shares some observations, based on the firm's experience of working with global clients, on what private credit investment firms look for in a technology partner.

The rise of private credit

In the aftermath of the Global Financial Crisis (GFC), the private credit industry has come a long way to become one of the fastest-growing institutional asset classes globally. At the end of 2021, Preqin estimated that total assets under management (AUM) stood at more than $1.21trn, clocking an average 13.5% annual growth rate over the last ten years. By 2023 it is estimated that private credit would become the second-largest alternative investment asset class and, by 2026, reach a staggering $2.61trn in AUM.

to investment data and improve operational efficiencies. There are many lessons we believe will stick with investment managers – chief among them being the criticality of establishing a robust technology infrastructure.

Having worked closely with private credit investment firms for nearly a decade and seeing the space undergo a gradual shift, we have been able to identify the key drivers that they look for when evaluating their technology partners.

Flexibility and scalability range of asset classes provides investment managers with the agility to capitalise on new opportunities. A single ecosystem also ensures they are able to maintain tight risk controls.

Integration capabilities

A growing number of investment managers today look for a solution that has an open-ended framework – one with strong integration capabilities that can link with multiple upstream/downstream systems, both internal and external.

Strong integration capabilities mean there is a streamlined flow

Banks employ tools to dig into CLO warehouse exposures

By Sayed Kadri

Credit analytics firm Oxane Partners has started a new business catering to the needs of CLO warehouse lenders, say officials at the company.

Banks have been monitoring their warehouse exposures since March when the coronavirus pandemic caused loan prices to plummet into the 70s. This triggered draw stops, causing warehouses to freeze until valuations rose.

Although warehouse structures have recovered, the episode has highlighted the need for banks to be able to examine their warehouse exposures on a deal-by-deal basis across their lending book.

he says. "It's a complete solution: we integrate data from third parties, cleanse it, set up checks on covenant breaches and then provide a dashboard for banks to zoom in on any section of their warehouse

Infrastructure Investor

No longer on the sidelines

The pandemic has forced GPs to change their approach, for the better, on investment management technology, says Oxane Partners' chief sales and marketing officer

Infrastructure GPs have traditionally been conservative with regard to technology; their priorities have been on building, operating and maintaining assets. In the past decade though, technology has pervaded the sector with the advent of smart sensors, drones and the internet of things enabling GPs and asset managers to benefit from prevenenhancing investor communication. Some larger ones are transitioning from an Excel-based system to technology-driven processes with the aim of increasing access to portfolio data at all times, better capturing risk and performance KPIs for each of the projects, automating manual processes and improving investor reporting.

Loan Servicing 2.0

Vishal Soni, co-founder at Oxane Partners, talks about the digital transformation in real estate finance

Earlier this year, Oxane Partners, a leading technology-driven solutions provider to the real estate industry, announced its expansion into loan servicing followed by the firm being rated by DBRS Morningstar as a commercial mortgage servicer. Over the last few years, Oxane has earned a reputation in real estate investment management technology, picking up several industry awards before their latest foray into loan servicing. The firm's co-founder, Vishal Soni, talks about this expansion and plans for the future.

REFI Europe: Tell us about how it all started for Oxane Partners?

Vishal Soni (VS): Before we co-founded Oxane Partners, Sumit and I were at Deutsche Bank's real estate and structured finance desks. Back in the day, managing these complex transactions meant spending an inordinate amount of time poring over spreadsheets. There was a glaring gap in terms of availability and fitment on the technology front

REFI Europe: Why and how did you decide to venture into loan servicing?

VS: With the Oxane CREST platform, our focus was on helping real estate lenders better manage their deal pipeline, deal screening, portfolio management and reporting with a technology-driven ecosystem. Within a couple of years, the platform grew to monitor over €35bn in assets under management.

"Given our depth of expertise in the asset class, award-winning technology, and an experienced servicing team, expanding further
